f (ornay's Magnificent Accoupt of the Czar's Magnificent Reception at the Royal Albert Hall,

From his last London letter to the Cincinnati

But I should say that the Crar never did-and never will again-witness such a sight as greeted him at the Royal Albert Hail. This building-much the finest and largest in the world-was filled to its utmost espacity by the wealth and fashion of London, thousands of those present being in court dress, and presenting, under the hundreds of gaseliers which shine in the dome like little suns, an effect which, in the fatal terminology of the reporters, I can only describe as indescribable, I looked upon the scene from various points of view, and the best was from the top. Looking down thence, the whole interior, floor and walls, seemed to be hung with s me rich oriental drapery; the scrolls and colors of which, after gazing a moment longer, were found to be animated-to be gentlen en and ladies arrayed in all the purple and gold which wealth can secure-and fairly shimmering with the light of gems, When the royal party entered, about thirty in number, the vast mass arose, the organ broke forth, the thousand of performers rose up-one army of female singers in white and blue, another in red and whitethe Coldstream band, with its blare brass, the vast orchestra with its strings, and the torty drummers in bearskin caps perched along the wall in a balcony-and the national anthem of Russia rang out as if a burricane had been employed to utter it. The music was all of the big kind, not very classical, but full of the thunderous national airs, and glorified with the hallelujak chorus and a fine Russian church anthem. The Czar stood as one amazed. The Princess of Wales on one side of him, his daughter on the other, and decorations all around, he looked like the hero of some fine opera gaining his apotheosis with a chorus of tairies to celebrate his praises. For some time, now, Queen Fashion has dictated a defferent costume for ladies from that which Queen Victoria exacts, but last night the English Court prevailed and decolletee dresses were general. Still, as is generally the case, the dresses became more and more low-bodied as the eye wandered to the boxes of the aristocracy, and then the nobility, ranged near the three royal boxes, until at lergth in the latter the ladies, according to the whispers among the middle classes, "seemed to have nothing at all on when they sat down." The Duchess of Ediu-burgh is not pretty at a day show, but she has a magnificent bust, which comes out with a lavish display in evening dress. This lady and the Princess of Wales were raised into a kind of rivalry as to dress by the critical crowd. The Duchess were a tiara of large diamond stars, and a necklace of diamonds falling in double curves, and the Princess of Wales had her hair stuck all over with diamond stars and a necklace of as large diamonds as ever were seen. Both ladies had their low corsage fringed with diamonds.

The dress of the Duchess was of blue silk.

with face trimmings worked down in fern-leaf patterns on the front of the skirt; the could not have told whether the last piece sung was from "Tannhauser" or "Ernani."

Prince Arthur was seated on a back chair chattering with a remarkably pretty lady he Lad discovered in an adjacent box. When we left the building, after 11 o'clock, the street presented an amazing sight. A dense mass of people stood as a wall in front of the Albert monument, and as the royal carriages with their drivers and footmen, gorgeous in gold embroidery, drove up one after the other, the crowd shouted, screamed, roared for each object of their admiration as he or she emerged, the most lusty accemation being for the Princess of Wales. How strange must seem to that delicate little lady the outcome of her fortune, since she and her sister Dagmar-now the Crown Princess of the two greatest European nationslived, pay, worked in poverty in the seclusion of a Danish farm. There were double lines of splendid carriages stretching for near half a mile on the Kensington road, and a line of cabs stretching much further. It was almost in vain, however, for those who emerged from the building to get to their carriages, and anywhere along the street might be found ladies in evening dress searching the long line of the vehiclesmuch to the delight of the outsiders if not to their own. However, it was a soft, baliny evening, the stars shone brilliantly, and none of them are probably any the worse to-day for having participated in an occasion as brilliant, one may safely affirm, as any that has ever been witnessed in any capital of Europe. [From the New Orleans Times.] Done.

My first reportorial experience was not calculated to inspire a love of that profes- volver and shot a small boy that stood near sion. I was engaged upon the local staff of and was inoffensively looking on. Upon the Daily Anguish upon trial, at a very small salary. Being acquainted with the manager, and imagining myself in every way competent, I accordingly was, as before stated, up. taken upon trial for a week.

I started on Monday morning, bright and early, determined that my share of the news lation of the Anguish at least 10 per cent. After wandering about nearly the whole day that a shooting-match had taken place on S street, and accordingly started around to the compulsory on all drivers to uphold their locality, found that I had not been misin- dignity, and that he had been drinking formed, took notes, and next morning's paper had the following, which I thought the

SHOCKING MURDER.

"Michael Houliban was shot and instantly killed by Thomas McDagger yesterday, at No. 2489 S- street. Houlihan had been quarreling with McDagger, and the result was that the latter drew his revolver and shot Houliban through the head, death taking place almost instantly."

The next morning I was told that the local editor wished to see me. Of course I attended instantly, and was informed by that their efficiency. gentleman that a DOUBLE MURDER had taken place. I, on the qui vive to know where asked that question, and in a sepulchral voice calculated to congeal the marrow in one's bones, he slowly uttered, "Look there," pointing to my original version of the murder of the previous day. "That," said he, "is simply "- (adjective referring to the lower regions) "and if that's the best you can do in the murder line, you had bet- by a friend, and duly appeared in the mornter (very politely, but sarcasm evident) try poetry as better suited to your powers of boarding-house the following note, addressed imagination." I told him I had never "done" a murder before, and would, with his permission, try and do better next time.

I then proceeded in search of another paragraph, determined this time to startle the community, indeed. The previous day's experience attended this one, nothing turning up until nearly night, when, meeting a friend, I learned that a widow lady had been GARROTED AND ROBBED . the previous evening, and as yet nothing had appeared concerning it. Here I wanted, and to "go for" that widow was not the work of hours.

Into her presence, to find her a person of whom a garroter had evidently studied well position of recontant for the honorable before tackling, and with whom I felt some diffidence about doing the same thing; but

Ljournal for information, I shall take the liberty of asking you for the information which menced thusly: Reporter: "Madame, I understand you were garroted and robbed last evening. Widow: " Well, what business is that of vours!" Reporter: "But, madame, I have the honor to represent the Daily Anguish."

Widow: "That's none of my business." Reporter: "But, my dear madame, if you will understand me correctly, its in behalf of the public I speak, who will seek through our widely-circulated columns the particulars of the brutal outrage, which is now but partially known." Widow: "All that I can say is that if they should seek until they find the circulation of your paper is assured; and, young man, believing, as I do, that you have no further business with me, I think you will see the necessity of allowing me a few minutes of privacy."

This was said in a tone that admitted of no expestulation, so that nothing was left for me to do but to depart; not, however, before noticing a legend on the door which explained that "S. A. Pilkins" dwelt within. The evening had somewhat advanced when I reached the office, and I determined that my imagination would have to be tested in this case, at least, as I had but the bare fact of the name, which I naturally concluded to be Sarah Ann Pilkins, and the residence 937 Trundle street, together with the fact that such a robbery had taken place. The result is the following, taken from the columns of the Anguish of July 30, though

AN AGED LADY GARROTED AND ROBBED - PARTICU-LARS AS GIVEN TO OUR REPORTER BY THE

somewhat condensed:

LADY. A lady, residing at No. 937 Trundle street, while pursuing her way homeward last evening, was attacked by a monster in human form, who knocked her down with a slungshot, rendering her insensible, whereupon she was robbed of her porte-monnaie, containing $60,000 in United States Government 5-20 bonds, besides some small change. Not content with this, the brute next proceeded to tear in small pieces a magnificent $30 bonnet, and stripped her person of diamonds amounting in value to $16,436.75, the seventy-five cents having just been paid that morning for repairs to the magnificent diamond brooch. The lady was assisted home by several policemen, and now lies in a precarious condition; but the physicians say that, thanks to a wonderful constitution, she may survive. No clue to the bold perpetrator of this deed has as yet been discovered. When is taken into consideration the age of this lady, which is ninety-six, and the fact that she is a deserving widow, struggling hard with six small children to get along in the world, the case will appear to be peculiarly aggravating." Upon banding my manuscript to the local sub, he glanced over the first few lines, marked it, and off it went to the typos. The next morning I was again in demand; being informed when I arrived at the office that twenty-seven persons had called to see me that morning, all looking pretty much like the same person; also, that the editor-inchief wished the pleasure of my society for a few minutes. As I went through that auleaf patterns on the front of the skirt; the Princess of Wales had on a sort of dark claret-colored silk, with a great deal of lace. It was a moment of triumph for the Duchess, and she could not—did not try to—conceal the child-like joy with which she was filled. Her eyes sparkled, her bosom rose and sank with the quick respirations, and she turned now to chat with her father and again with now to chat with her father and again with the Prince of Wales on her left, and I fancy not be so particular as to the exact the Prince of Wales on her left, and I fancy not be so particular as to the exact the FURNITURE. amount lost in a case of robbery, as it might sometimes necessitate my manuscript getting too late for press, and dismissed me. I went out much troubled in my mind, as I had great reason to think the editor had been quizzing me; but the cordial manner in which the local editor greeted me was reässuring indeed. He said he had entirely mistaken my genius, and said my forte was reporting certainly, but especially garrote cases, but could not understand why I had used a slungshot when I had the garrote so handy. However, I was entitled to a holiday, and could go for the day, but might send in any little item I should chance to pick up before midnight. I started off in high glee, determined that I should prove my gratitude by sending in before night something that I should prove my gratitude by 1 fine stem-winding Howard Watch, in 18 karat heavy Gold Case, 1 genuine F. About 9 o'clock that evening, being as yet without the coveted item, I saw a young lady, in stepping off a Broad-street car, fall severely injuring berself. Here was my only chance, and next morning's paper coatained the following:

THAT PURPOSE. While Miss Poa, a well-known belle of Slant street, was stepping off a Broad-street ear yesterday, she fell, striking her head on the step of the car, breaking it, then falling insensible on the track. The driver, Heinrich Shankiel, thereupon became so incensed that, unhitching his horse from the forward end of the car, he drove it around deliberately Reporting Extraordinary-How it is to the other end, and making fast to the car ran over the unfortunate lady.
